While Substance of Statement Arm and Leg of President Were Affected Seems Admitted, No Official News.

BY DAVID LAWRENCE.

So far as can be discovered, neither President Wilson nor Dr. Cary T. Grayson. U. S. N., his physicism, were consulted concerning the statement, and there is good reason to believe that its publication was displeasing to them. On the other hand, it is thought inconceivable that a man of Dr. Young's position would so far violate professional others and authorise a newspaper interview, revealing the nature of the illness of one of his patients without sanction. The plain inference is that somebody in the government who has felt that the White House policy of concealing the facts of the president's filness was maleading and unfair to the public, told Dr. Young to go shead.

It is not important to know who the person was, but it is a confession that the curiosity of the public to know the truth about the president's ailment has at last touched a point where the president's own household to keep the matter a private affair, are to some extent being set aside in the interest of the ter a private affair, are to some extent being set aside in the interest of the public.

The whole situation develops out of the conflict between the rights of the public and the rights of the president and his family to keep their privacy from being invaded. Just where does the right of the public end and the right of a public official begin?

Many Defenders.

Many Defenders.

There are those who defend vigorously the White House policy of silence, on the ground that while the president was in the midst of the serious stage of his illness, and nobody could tell just what developments might bring, it would have been politically disastrous to hand over to Mr. Wilson's political opponents a lever with which to delay action on the treaty, by raising the question of the president's incapacity to discharge his public duties.

Now that the president has passed the crisis and is on the road to recovery, it is insisted that no harm can be done by revealing in retrospect the facts of the case.

by revealing in retrospect the facts of the case. On the other hand, the distinct loss to the White House in the circumstances is in the impression that it has given to so many persons that informal utterances on subjects of interest to the public may have to be taken with a grain of sait.

There always arises a moment in every administration when the newspaper correspondents begin to lose faith in the sincerity of public men who do not deal frankly. Usually, when an embarrassing question arises, officials have been known to make a clean breast of a case and point out the reasons why secrecy is necessary. is necessary.

This was particularly true during the war, and there are no cases of impor-tance on record wherein confidence was violated.

but in the matter of Mr. Wilson's illness, the correspondents have literally been up a tree. Torn between a desire not to pry too closely into the private affairs of the president and conscious, at the same time, that the public has a right to know whether its chief executive can transact public business, the newspaper men have consistently accepted statements made to them from authoritative sources as being trank and complete.

Dr. Young's revelations give the im-ing frank and complete.

Dr. Young's revelations give the impression that, on more than one occasion, the correspondents were deliberately misled. This may not be important from the viewpoint of officials, for they frequently imagine the public much less interested in events than are the inquiring correspondents. More than one request for information has been lightly dismissed as "idle" curiosity.

Demand Intensified.

Demand Intensified.

In this particular instance, however, the policy of withholding the truth served only to intensify the eagerness of the public to know the true state of Mr. Wilson's health. Demands for information have come from newspapers usually very friendly, but these editorials have had little effect.

Somebody then hit upon the idea of issuing an inspired statement giving details. This appeared nearly a month aro in a Baltimore newspaper, but the rame of the physician was not given. Then the same newspaper actuated, no doubt, by the desire to keep faith with its readers, printed a second statement, this time by the authority of Dr. Hugh Young himself.

Just how much the White House played a part in this effort to set the public straight cannot be ascertained as yet. Certainly the more direct method would have been to issue a statement to the Associated Press or the United Press or International News Service, which three services reach all the newspapers of the country.

But the mystery deepens, when it is found that some of the things in Dr. Young's utterance are described as "minor inaccuracies," and, while the substance of his declaration appears to be admitted, it is pointed out by others who are in a position to know that Dr. Young was not called in until the trouble with the prostatic gland developed. The inference is that he learned about the case second-hand from the other physicians who treated the president's condition issued on the authority of the White House. WASHINGTON, Feb, 13.—Something of a mystery develops the issuance by Dr. Hugh H. Young, of Johns Hopkins university, of a statement describing in detail the illness of President Wilson, and revealing particularly what the White House has so long declined to admit, namely, that the president was suffering from an impairment of his left left and arm. So far as can be discovered, neither President Wilson, and revealing particularly what the White House has so long declined to admit, namely, that the president was suffering from an impairment of his left left and arm.
